In September 2017, the Fine-Art Photography Association (FAPA) will hold the fourth Daikanyama Photo Fair. Galleries, bookstores, and publishers that have supported the fair since its inception are joined by other leading figures in fine art photography, including many from outside Japan. This year, the fair returns to the fundamental issue of “What is photography?” and looks closely at many different aspects of photography in conjunction with experts in a variety of areas, adopting “Photography X” themes. Public programs include domestic and international photographers, critics, and curators from art museums talking about current initiatives and experiments in an attempt to take fine art photography another step forward. Alongside the fair, an exhibition featuring photography by contemporary artist Yoshitomo Nara introduces the world of his artworks as revealed through the medium of photography.

FAPA is delighted to present this marvelous opportunity to consider the questions produced by the intermingling of diverse gazes through photography, and to contemplate the future of fine art photography that those questions make visible.

About FAPA (Fine-Art Photography Association)

The Fine-Art Photography Association (FAPA) was founded in December 2013 to establish and promote the photographic arts and visual culture in general and Japanese fine art photography in particular. To realize these aims, FAPA will foster and support young photographers and help Japanese photographers, and the educational programs they operate, achieve better international recognition. FAPA, as a general incorporated association operated by galleries, publishers, and booksellers that handle fine art photography, started its activity in 2014.
